

Waste management Students around town

UniSeý and ETH-Zurich students have been busy at work this week, interviewing stakeholders.

Contributed

Students from both schools are contacting recyclers, waste managers, government officials, and households all over Mahé. One may even see them trying to interview residents in downtown Victoria or passengers on their way to catch the bus.

Other groups are collecting more technical data through water samples at the Providence Landfill and statistical information from the National Bureau of Statistics.

As hard as the students have been working on their research, they have still been able to find the project rewarding. Krystel D'Offay, a first year UniSeý student, reflects on her personal experiences so far. "This has been a great experience for me. There are lots of things I didn't know before, like how the government works and manages waste. I'm really looking forward to writing the research paper next week too."

The data collection phase will continue into next week as the students prepare to write a first draft of the report on waste management on 8 July.

